Equatorial Guinea Basic Facts

Equatorial Guinea is a small Central African nation with vast offshore oil reserves making it one of Africa's wealthier countries, on paper. Unfortunately much of the population still struggles with poverty and lack of access to decent schools. Most international visitors tend to be on business, but in 2012 the small country will have filled up every hotel space it has with soccer teams and fans. The Africa Cup of Nations will be played out in several stadiums across the country (as well as in neighboring Gabon) from January 21 - February 12.

Equatorial Guinea is the only African country where Spanish is widely spoken and is the official language.

Location: Equatorial Guinea is in fact not on the equator, but lies sandwiched between Gabon and Cameroon in Central Africa.

Area: Equatorial Guinea is a small country, covering 28,051 sq km, a little smaller than Belgium. Its territory is composed of a little chunk of mainland and five inhabited islands.

Capital City: Malabo (located offshore on Bioko Island).

Population: 670,000 people call Equatorial Guinea home

Language: Both Spanish and French are official languages, but most people speak native languages as their mother tongue, including Fang, and Bubi.

Religion: Roman Catholic and indigenous beliefs.

Climate: - Equatorial Guinea has a tropical climate with one dry season that usually lasts from December - February. Temperatures remain constant throughout the year, averaging between 84 - 88 Fahrenheit (29 - 32 Celsius). The wettest months are May and June.

Best time to Visit: The dry months between December and February is the best time to visit Equatorial Guinea. It is warm year round.

Currency: Central African Franc (XAF)
